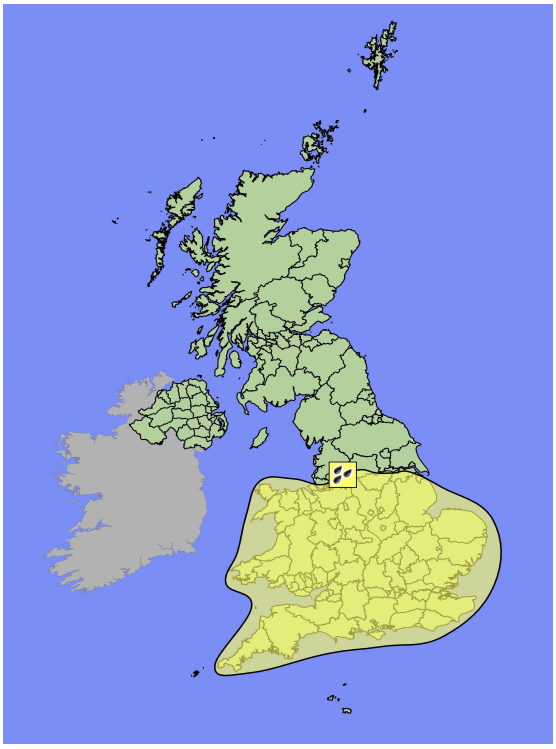
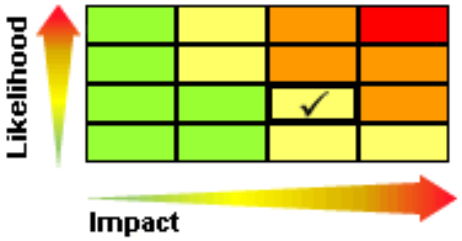
National Severe Weather Warning Service





Chief Forecasters Assessment
An active frontal zone will become slow-moving and roughly aligned west to east across England and Wales today. The most likely position is across central and northern Wales to East Anglia. Amounts of rainfall are expected to be 10 to 15 mm for most and 20 to 40 mm locally. To the south of this zone, southern parts of England and Wales, will see brighter conditions developing through the morning. However this will allow heavy, slow moving, thundery showers to develop. These have the potential to generate as much as 20 mm of rainfall in an hour locally. The general rainfall amounts would not normally present too many problems, but given the wet ground some localised flooding is possible. As suggested above there remains uncertainty in the position of the frontal zone and heaviest rain so please watch for possible updates to this warning.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Warning of Rain

Valid from 02:00 on Fri, 13th Jul 2012 until 23:59 on Fri, 13th Jul 2012

Many parts of central and southern England along with Wales will have further spells of rain today which will be heavy in places. The more persistent rain appears more likely across parts of central and eastern England and north Wales whilst across most of southern England and south Wales, local heavy thundery downpours are likely this afternoon and evening.

The public should be aware that given saturated ground across many parts, localised flooding and disruption to travel may result.

This warning has been updated to include the whole of Wales.
